WHY REGISTRATION MATTERS

WHAT IS REGISTRATION?

After a state legislature passes a law that creates a title of “registered interior designer,” only those who have submitted the necessary education, experience, and examination to the state can call themselves a “registered interior designer.” Sometimes these laws also allow these registered interior designers to stamp and seal drawings for permits and/or bid on state projects.

WHY DOES REGISTRATION MATTER?

Registration shows consumers and clients that you have met the minimum standards to call yourself a “registered interior designer.” Consumers can be assured you have the education, examination, and experience necessary to be a professional interior designer.

Additionally, registration laws gives consumers a venue for the redress of grievances & complaints.

Numbers don't lie. If you ever want to expand your state's interior design legislation, high number of RIDs show legislators that registration matters to the profession.

Registration shows that interior designers are a registered design professional on par with architects, landscape architects, and engineers for their specific area of expertise.

BENEFITS TO PROFESSIONALS

- Awareness – “RID” shows other professionals that you support increasing public awareness of interior design as a profession
- Identification – RID is a registered design professional, which is defined in the International Building Code, as “an individual who is registered or licensed to practice their respective design profession as defined by the statutory requirements of the professional registration law of the state in which the project is being constructed”
- Reciprocity – Most states that regulate interior design offer reciprocity for individuals registered in another state.
- Permitting - Registration can give the privilege and responsibility of submitting drawings of interiors for building permits.

BENEFITS TO THE PUBLIC

- Interior design registration expands the options for consumers for design services in interiors.
- The public can identify the qualified interior designers easily and effectively.
- The public is assured those with the title “registered interior designers” will make informed choice about building codes, suitability of materials, and will create healthy, functional, and engaging interior environments.

CONTINUING EDUCATION:

Interior Design is continuously evolving as a profession as we change how we use and understand the interior environment. As such, most states require registered interior designers to complete continuing education courses to ensure the public that registration means a professional knows not only the basics but current best practices in interior design.

HOW DO I GET REGISTERED?

Most states require an interior design degree from a Council for Interior Design Accreditation (CIDA) accredited university program, at least two years of relevant & diverse interior design experience, and successful passage of the National Council of Interior Design Qualification (NCIDQ) examination.
